Comments by the authors:

Chronic nodular prurigo (syn.: prurigo nodularis) is a highly pruritic condition often refractory to treatment. We performed a multicenter prospective study in Europe to understand patients' needs and satisfaction with therapy. Improvement of itch is the most important therapy goal for patients. Although most patients had a moderate/severe disease, only a minority were treated with potent medications such as systemic immunosuppressants, gabapentinoids or novel biologic drugs, which likely contributes to high levels of dissatisfaction with therapy. Our findings highlight the suboptimal management of patients with this burdensome condition. Implementation of the new guideline for chronic prurigo is essential to improve care. Read more

Medical Journals Sweden

Since almost 30 years, Acta Dermato-Venereologica (ActaDV) has been successfully collaborating with the Journal of Rehabilitation Medicine, by sharing office and employment responsibility for the editorial staff members. Since January 2021 this joint editorial office has been turned into a separate publishing company, Medical Journals Sweden AB. The organization thereby constitutes a more robust basis for staff employment as well as for future investment in equipment and technologies. The editorial staff as well as the domain name medicaljournals.se and the non-profit ideology remain unchanged however. Hence our skilled Senior Editorial Assistant, Anna-Maria Andersson who has been with us since 1994, will maintain the responsibility for the entire publication process for ActaDV, and will thus remain your contact person also in the future. The Editorial Manager and CEO is now Ms Therese Granlund. Mrs Agneta Andersson is the Chairperson of the company's board, which also consists of two academic persons from each of the two owning organizations.
