Comments by the authors:

Data from a population-based birth cohort consisting of young adults with atopic dermatitis show that atopic dermatitis has a negative impact on health-related quality of life from adolescence to adulthood. Further, young adults with atopic dermatitis have limited contact with healthcare, regardless of atopic dermatitis severity, and their self-reported use of cortisone cream is also limited. Increased awareness of these shortcomings among caregivers is needed, so they can support young adults with atopic dermatitis with regular consultations, adequate treatment and in self-management, to increase their self-care capacity and help them take control of their disease.
