Comments by the authors:

Alopecia areata is an inflammatory and non-scarring type of alopecia which affects patients of all ages and ethnicities and can lead to significant psychological impairment. The main goal of this paper was to describe the effectiveness and safety of tofacitinib for the treatment of severe alopecia areata in a real-world setting. Real-world evidence for novel treatments is of interest to improve therapeutic approaches for diseases that currently lack satisfactory solutions, such as alopecia areata, thus also improving the quality of life of the patients suffering from them.
